'Forestation to be No. 1 priority after unification'

By Kim Tae-gyu

Planting trees and preserving the forests of North Korea is expected to become the first crucial project when the two Koreas reunify, according to a senior bureaucrat of the South.

Korea Forest Service (KFS) Minister Chung Kwang-soo made this point during an interview earlier this week held on the sidelines of the International Union of Forest Research Organizations (IUFRO) World Congress.

"The mountains of the two Koreas are inter-connected across the peninsula. Yet, their eco-systems are disconnected as many of the North's forests have

Japan and Sweden nudged past the South. By contrast, the North suffers from frequent floods due to deforestation.

On top of brightening the future of the two Koreas, Chung said that forestation would be of great help in achieving low-carbon green growth, which is the buzzword of late — trees act as carbon sinks.

"Currently, mankind is facing the three major threats of climate change, reduced biodiversity and fast desertification. Trees hold the solution to all three problems," the 56-year-old said.

"The world is also well aware of the fact as demonstrated by the United Nations, which declared 2011 as the Interna-tingly conflicting objects of economic development and environmental protection at once. Many envy our feat," said Chung who took charge of the KFS last year.

"Our economic exploits are widely touted. And our success in forestation has also gained recognition. That's why we are hosting the IUFRO event this week and will organize the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification (UNCCD) session next year."

The IUFRO is a non-profit, non-government international network of forest scientists and their annual gathering is presently underway at the COEX, southern Seoul throughout this week.
